

Latinos and Health Coverage: California by the Numbers

Latinos¹ are more likely to be uninsured than any other racial or ethnic group in the U.S. However, Hispanic families' access to health insurance varies by state (see Figure 1). In California:

- ❖ Latinos have inadequate access to the current health coverage system. In 2008, only about two-fifths (41.4%) of all Latinos living in California had employer-sponsored health insurance, and more than one-quarter (26.6%) were covered by Medicaid or the Children's Health Insurance Program.²
- ❖ As a result, Latino families are at risk for uninsurance. That year, more than one in four (28.6%) Latinos in California were uninsured, and about one in seven (13.7%) Latino children under age 18 had no form of health coverage.³
- ❖ Latinos are overrepresented among the uninsured. Although Hispanics made up nearly two-fifths (37.8%) of the total state population in 2008, they represented almost three-fifths (58.2%) of California's uninsured.⁴
